the art of socks

The father of organic architecture meets The Art of Socks in Ozone's Frank Lloyd Wright Collection. Wright's work has literally built the way we build today, and we're excited to have his influence as the foundation of five new styles. Some are based on well-known motifs present throughout his canon, while others take direct references from famous structures: the Avery Coonley Playhouse and the iconic spiral ramp from the interior of New York's Guggenheim Museum.

In true Wright tradition, we began with geometric repetitions and added vibrant splashes of color, twisting, turning and contorting the originals into something completely new. Designer Aris Georges describes this creative process as "a way to refocus the design world's obsession with novelty into an open-source future." This truly democratic method of creating works of art and architecture (and artful architecture) embodies Wright's philosophy of functional pieces that enhance the environment and the lives of the individuals using them. We hope these socks will do the same, adding comfort, style and geometric sophistication to your wardrobe!

One of Wright's most famous motifs, this opus of symmetry is found in the Darwin D. Martin house and has been widely influential in art and architecture ever since. With two different colorways to choose from, this Tree of Life is giving us life!

A continuation of Wright's famous Avery Coonley House project, the playhouse was actually commissioned to function as a kindergarten classroom. Its abstract stained glass designs take imagery from the idea of a parade -- confetti, balloons and banners -- so it'll always be a party when you're wearing this pair.

Aside from the actual shape of buildings that Wright was often responsible for, he was just as known for the artwork present on many of the windows. The designs on these pairs are based on geometrical repetition, combination and abstraction, but what's not abstract is how nicely these are going to fit in with your style.

If you've ever been in New York's Guggenheim Museum, you'll agree that its iconic spiral ramp (looking at it and walking up) is something that's nearly impossible to forget. Transcribed onto this pair of socks, these twisting and turning stripes will have heads twisting and turning to look back at your feet!
